Published in 1938, it presents a stark and harrowing picture of the brutality and oppression that characterized the regime. This article examines the significance of this powerful work, particularly focusing on its various student editions, which played a crucial role in educating generations of students about the atrocities committed under Hitler's rule.

In 1935, a group of exiled German writers and intellectuals, including Bertolt Brecht, Lion Feuchtwanger, and Rudolf Olden, conceived a plan to compile and publish a collection of testimonies from victims and witnesses of Nazi persecution. Their goal was to document the horrors of the regime and counter the Nazi propaganda that sought to deceive the German people and the international community.

Over the next three years, they meticulously gathered and edited a vast number of firsthand accounts, including diaries, letters, court transcripts, and newspaper articles. These accounts paint a vivid and disturbing picture of the arbitrary arrests, torture, and killings perpetrated by the Nazis.
