Siqueiros was a Mexican muralist who was active in the Mexican Revolution and the Mexican Communist Party. He was a strong advocate for the rights of workers and peasants, and his art often reflected his political beliefs. The Tropical Ice Cream Company mural was one of his most ambitious and controversial works.

The mural is divided into three panels. The first panel depicts a group of workers protesting against racial discrimination. They are holding signs that say "No More Jim Crow" and "We Demand Equal Rights." The second panel shows a group of women fighting against sexual harassment. They are punching and kicking a man who is trying to assault them. The third panel depicts a group of workers fighting against economic exploitation. They are holding signs that say "Down with Capitalism" and "Workers of the World Unite."

The mural was controversial from the start. Some people objected to its political content, while others were offended by its depiction of violence and nudity. The mural was even vandalized several times. However, Siqueiros refused to back down, and the mural remains a powerful symbol of the struggles of migrant workers.
