The 53rd volume of the New South African Review is titled "New Paths, Old Compromises: Reflections on State Capacity, Political Settlements and Service Delivery." The volume brings together a range of essays that explore the challenges and opportunities facing South Africa as it seeks to consolidate its democracy and build a more prosperous and equitable society.

The essays in this volume are divided into three sections. The first section, "State Capacity," examines the capacity of the South African state to deliver on its promises to its citizens. The essays in this section explore the challenges of building a capable and responsive state, and the implications of state capacity for service delivery and economic development.

The second section, "Political Settlements," examines the nature of political settlements in South Africa. The essays in this section explore the different ways in which power is shared and negotiated between different groups in society, and the implications of these settlements for governance and stability.

The third section, "Service Delivery," examines the challenges and opportunities facing South Africa in delivering essential services to its citizens. The essays in this section explore the different factors that affect service delivery, and the ways in which these factors can be addressed to improve the quality and accessibility of services.

The essays in this volume provide a valuable contribution to our understanding of the challenges and opportunities facing South Africa as it seeks to consolidate its democracy and build a more prosperous and equitable society. The essays offer a range of perspectives on the key issues facing the country, and they provide a valuable resource for scholars, policymakers, and activists working to improve the lives of all South Africans.
